College School Supplies

Do textbook purchases drain your budget right at the beginning of each semester? If you buy the newest books at the most convenient locations, you may be saving time, but you're probably spending much more than necessary. If you are willing to do a little research and step beyond your school's bookstore, you could save a significant amount of money—and in college, every little bit counts, right?

Rent or Buy Used

If you are taking a class for general education credit or just to explore different subjects, renting a textbook is a great option to save money. For a class within your major, you may want to buy the textbook so you can keep it after the semester ends, but if you are a math major, you probably will not need that art history book once May rolls around. Do yourself a favor and rent it. That way, you will not pay as much initially and you will not have to go through the hassle of trying to re-sell it after your final exam.

Comparison Shopping

When shopping for textbooks, convenience is not always your best bet. Although it is unbelievably easy to walk down to your university bookstore and pick up the books you need, that is an incredibly expensive option. Comparison shopping online can literally save you hundreds on textbooks and you'll find that it is well worth your time. Websites such as booksprice.com will compare the price of your book between various online vendors. Then you will be able to order the textbook online and know that you got a great deal.

Sell Back

Once the semester is over, if you know, you will not look back at a textbook you used for a class, dedicate some time to re-sell it. List your used books on eBay or another website, or just advertise around your campus. You are sure to find another student to buy it from you. Then you can use that money to buy textbooks for next semester!
